And today's financial tip:

What business is normally conducted at an Annual General Meeting?

At an Annual General Meeting (known as an AGM), the general membership of the company is informed of the company's financial performance during the previous financial year and about its future plans. The general membership also exercises its rights by voting on the company's directors and their fees for the coming year, acceptance of the annual report, minutes of the last AGM, the proposed dividend, and appointment of the company's auditors.
