And today's financial tip:

What business is normally conducted at an Annual General Meeting?

At an Annual General Meeting (known as an AGM), the general membership of the company is informed of the company's financial performance during the past financial year and its future plans. The general membership exercises its rights by voting on the company's directors for the coming year, the directors' rate of pay, acceptance of the annual report, minutes of the last AGM, the dividend rate payable, and appointment of the company's solicitors and auditors.
